Space Secrets

How the CBI killed
India's biggest espionage case

NILEENA MS

The ISRO espionage case is remembered as one of India's biggest scandals not because espionage was conclusively proven, but because of the unprecedented drama that played out between the government's investigating agencies. It was the early 1990s, and India was entering a new phase in the global space race. The IB and the Kerala police were probing links that indicated vital information about India's rocket projects was being sold for large sums of money. The investigation was in its initial stages, but what they found suggested that the six suspects were part of a shadowy international network. When the CBI officially took over, the expectation was that these leads would be probed further. This did not happen. There is very little agreement today on even the bare facts of the case. The same individuals made different confession statements to different investigating agencies. But one version has trumped all others. This has happened without a proper trial, or a proper investigation into the facts of the matter, ever taking place.
